

The transformation of Hintze Hall marks the beginning of a decade of change for the Museum. Suspended dynamically from the ceiling and plunging through the iconic hall, our blue whale skeleton will take centre stage. In this one specimen the blue whale will reveal stories about evolution, the diversity of the world today and the importance of our role in sustaining life on Earth.

A large, detailed photograph of a blue whale skeleton suspended from the ceiling of a grand, gothic-style hall. The skeleton is the central focus, with its long, curved ribs and massive skull bones clearly visible. The hall has high, vaulted ceilings with a skylight and several arched windows with stained glass. The architecture is made of light-colored stone.
